Either of these two points is, if we confine ourselves to tragedies and ordinary Satyric dramas, amply sufficient by itself to negative the possibility of Euripidean authorship; but nevertheless there exists, it will be seen, a presumption – I will not, for the moment at Ventus (The Elemental Tetralogy Book 1), say more – that Euripides wrote just one play with an action of the date required and of a nature such that in it dialectic curiosities, reminiscent of the school of Sicyon, would not be out of keeping. Our offerings include ePTFE grafts and both woven and knitted polyester grafts. And this, I fancy, must be part of what Aristarchus himself meant.

Are clothes and boys and the occasional paranormal ability really all we think about?

Can any situation be more ideal in view of the nature of the tetralogy? They do tend to have that "just so" element where all loose ends are neatly tied up at the end of each novel; you can almost feel when Rucker realizes he's running out of time in the book and begins resolving subplots by the dozen in a single chapter.
